One of the greatest tricks of Photoshop is the _layer mask._ A layer mask is a special type of mask that is layered right on top of the image. Just click the layer to activate the mask (it's next to the layer icon in the Layers panel, shown in the margin). The mask's transparency allows you to see through the mask to the original image underneath. If a job in the art world calls for lettering, logos, or other design-related art, there really is no substitute for Photoshop. However, if your primary goal is to create web graphics, or if you prefer the "feel" of Illustrator, then you may want to consider learning Illustrator. After all, most web graphics (e.g., banners, buttons, and other web graphics) are created in Illustrator because it enables you to create all sorts of vector graphics. Photoshop is a full-fledged graphic design program. It provides features that other programs don't have, like the color and exposure controls, advanced layer features, selections tools, and a useful history feature. Photoshop has a learning curve, though, which is why it's important to practice using the tools. If you want to see some of Photoshop's features, click the Advanced icon (shown in the margin) on the menu bar and choose the Window menu. Choose Photoshop Help to display the Photoshop Help window. I walked in upon a group of teenage footballers, kicking a pinball machine in a sports bar. A manager walked around not really paying attention to them, not really caring about what they did. I stayed through them, following the shouts and the laughter until one finally noticed my presence, and asked "What's a publisher doing here?" "My bad," I said, before I disappeared in the night. You might want to go back to sleep now. You are not going back to sleep. You are getting up. It's time to start doing work. Well, I sat down and started writing my novel. I wrote 2,000 words in a few days and then I quit. The novel was blocked. I couldn't figure out what to write. The story was so vague and cardboard, the plot was unreliable and uninteresting. So I quit. It's true. I had been working for about two years on the story, I just never found a way to express it. This was the result. But I am a professional. And a professional gets up. They start working on Monday, even if they never started on Tuesday. So, after all this, the only thing I can do is start working. I've got a few options: I'll go back to complete this story, or I'll start another. I'll decide based on the little I've written after I tell you my final decision. What do you think? I have my first draft completed. I'm a man of my word. I did start writing a novel after about three years, but it's not bad. I mean, it really isn't. I'm a decent writer, but I can tell. I spent too many years writing articles on school newspapers and The Daily Titan, I can tell you that. There are some really great pieces here, but they weren't written by me, they were written by The Titan's editor, who is the only editor I've ever seen who we called "the bitch." But this isn't the time to talk about him. The point is, I don't think it was a particularly good piece. But I have a novel I wrote, I have a story I started writing, and I have a self-published book that I

How we do the questioning. This article describes some of the special aspects involved in the collection and documentation of information during an interview. Interviewers rely on concepts learned in oral communication classes. Four issues are addressed: (1) correct oral concepts and terms to be considered and used; (2) strategies to effectively learn, remember, and use these concepts; (3) the best practices for interviewing that are discussed in this article; and (4) some of the difficulties interviewers can encounter during the interview. Why is a US university pioneering the use of data about 'fake news' to improve how we process information online? The University of Buffalo students say they have built a mental map that shows which sources are more trusted. The researchers have created a tool that shows how some news stories spread, based on how many people tweet links to their content. It is hoped the same technique could be applied to other online sources. The students demonstrated their tool at the World Economic Forum in Davos on Monday, where they were joined by technology entrepreneurs and investors. The approach is based on an idea developed by a team of researchers, led by Hugo Spiers and Brian Stubblefield. They are using a technique called graph analytics to analyse data from social media to help people make more effective choices online. The researchers say the tool they built, called D-Scape, can be used to measure the popularity of articles on news websites. Image: The University of Buffalo researchers demonstrated their tool at the World Economic Forum in Davos The researchers tested their tool on a set of 400 links to fake news stories and 200 news stories with no fake information, from sources including The Guardian and The Washington Post. Their tool "consolidated the crowd-sourced data" and plotted the links on an interactive map to see which could be "trusted" - the bigger the circle, the more people tended to tweet links to it. Analysis like this is becoming increasingly important as people's attention is increasingly shared on the web. "The more influential a website is, the more that website has an impact on what gets passed along, said Dawn Song, one of the founders of D-Scape. "It's a way to measure the impact that the website has on the network," she added. Mr Spiers said that there was a similar "size of the crowd" approach used in assessing where people's web searches tend to go
