Patients with acute chest pain are evaluated by a variety of general practitioners. The main complaint of these patients is chest pain. The most common cause of acute chest pain is myocardial infarction. If the pain is not attributed to myocardial infarction, the condition is called non-cardiac chest pain. The aims of this study were to identify the causes of non-cardiac chest pain among patients with acute chest pain, and to establish the significance of routine biochemical analysis. The study was performed in the departments of internal medicine at Urmia University Hospital and in the outpatient clinics of the teaching hospitals affiliated with the University of Medical Sciences, in 1994. Patients with acute chest pain were included in the study on the basis of the following criteria: (i) presence of symptoms such as chest pain and/or shortness of breath, (ii) normal electrocardiographic changes and (iii) a normal echocardiography examination.
